Exhibit 5

This exhibit reports the result of the application of the Dragnet text extraction method to three URLs from rawstory.com and three URLs from alternet.org that are listed in the OpenWebText training set described in Plaintiffs' First Amended Complaint. A data scientist employed by Plaintiffs' counsel followed the text extraction steps described by OpenAI in the paper Alec Radford et al., Language Models are Unsupervised Multitask Learners, 3 https://cdn.openai.com/better-language-models/language_models_are_unsupervised_multitask_learners.pdf. First, the data scientist downloaded the content of the URLs in ."html" form. (Plaintiffs' counsel later confirmed that each article, as downloaded, contained author, title, and copyright notice information.) Second, he applied the Dragnet code to the downloaded article. The results are reproduced below. Each sample begins with the URL of the webpage followed by the entire content of the copy after the application of the Dragnet code.

Raw Story Example 1: https://www.rawstory.com/2015/08/kentucky-court-ignores-requests-to-remove-portrait-of-jesus-inside-court-house/

Portrait in Breathitt County Courthouse (Screenshot/WKYT) A Kentucky court house is being asked to remove a portrait of Jesus from its interior because a group advocating the Constitution's Establishment Clause says it sends a chilling message to non-Christians. The portrait , which appears to have been drawn in pencil or charcoal, show Jesus standing over a man who is kneeling and appears to be weeping, with the words, "In your place, what would Jesus do?" The Freedom From Religion Foundation is pushing for Breathitt County Courthouse to move it off court house grounds, according to Local8Now . "To put this at the seat of county government is really chilling. This sends this message that you better pretend to be a Christian if you want to get any service or justice around here," said FFRF co-president Annie Laurie Gaylor told the station. Gaylor said her organization has sent letters to the court house but has gotten no response, but it's a clear violation of the First Amendment's separation of church and state. Despite that, residents expressed support for keeping the picture where it is. "Basically ... gave His only begotten Son for us, so I believe it's wrong to take it down," Jackson resident Mike Mullins told the station. A resident concerned about the portrait alerted the FFRF, local WKYT reports . Gaylor said FFRF is open to legal action if necessary. Raw Story Example 2: https://www.rawstory.com/2012/05/police-miami-cannibal-was-overdosing-on-new-super-potent-lsd/

Disturbing new details have emerged about an incident in Miami, Florida in which police shot and killed a man who was tearing off and eating another man's face. According to Miami's WSVN , the victim, who is believed to be homeless, lost 75 percent of his face in the attack and is in critical condition at Jackson Memorial Hospital. Police claim that the dead man was overdosing on a new, powerful form of Lysergic Acid Diethlymide, the hallucinogen commonly known as LSD. Eyewitness Larry Vega was bicycling on the MacArthur parkway on Saturday afternoon when he saw the two naked men locked in a grisly struggle. The scene, he said, was like something from a horror movie. "And the guy was like tearing him to pieces with his mouth, so I told him, 'Get off!'" Vega said, "You know it's like the guy just kept eating the other guy away like ripping his skin." Vega flagged down a police officer, who ordered the attacker to let his victim go. The attacker ignored him, but when the officer jumped the concrete divider and shouted, Vega said, "the guy just stood his head up like that with a piece of flesh in his mouth and growled." The officer opened fire, striking the suspect, who barely paused as he continued to rip away the homeless man's face. The officer fired several more times until the attacker was dead. More police swarmed the scene and the victim was caught on Miami Herald surveillance cameras as he struggled to sit up. His face, said Vega, "was just a blob of blood. You couldn't really see, it was just blood all over the place." Police spokesman Armando Aguillar told reporters that the suspect may have been overdosing on a new, super-potent form of LSD. "What's happening is whenever we see that a person has taken all of his clothes off and has become violent, it's indicative of this excited delirium that's caused by overdose of drugs," he said, "What's happening is inside their body their organs are burning up alive." Neither man's identity has been released to the public. Raw Story Example 3: https://www.rawstory.com/2010/01/obama-staffer-infiltration-911-groups/

In a 2008 academic paper, President Barack Obama's appointee to head the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs advocated "cognitive infiltration" of groups that advocate "conspiracy theories" like the ones surrounding 9/11. Cass Sunstein, a Harvard law professor, co-wrote an academic article entitled "Conspiracy Theories: Causes and Cures," in which he argued that the government should stealthily infiltrate groups that pose alternative theories on historical events via "chat rooms, online social networks, or even real-space groups and attempt to undermine" those groups. As head of the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs, Sunstein is in charge of "overseeing policies relating to privacy, information quality, and statistical programs," according to the White House Web site. Sunstein's article, published in the Journal of Political Philosphy in 2008 and recently uncovered by blogger Marc Estrin, states that "our primary claim is that conspiracy theories typically stem not from irrationality or mental illness of any kind but from a 'crippled epistemology,' in the form of a sharply limited number of (relevant) informational sources." By "crippled epistemology" Sunstein means that people who believe in conspiracy theories have a limited number of sources of information that they trust. Therefore, Sunstein argued in the article, it would not work to simply refute the conspiracy theories in public -- the very sources that conspiracy theorists believe would have to be infiltrated. Sunstein, whose article focuses largely on the 9/11 conspiracy theories, suggests that the government "enlist nongovernmental officials in the effort to rebut the theories. It might ensure that credible independent experts offer the rebuttal, rather than government officials themselves. There is a tradeoff between credibility and control, however. The price of credibility is that government cannot be seen to control the independent experts." Download a PDF of the article here . Sunstein argued that "government might undertake (legal) tactics for breaking up the tight cognitive clusters of extremist theories." He suggested that "government agents (and their allies) might enter chat rooms, online social networks, or even real-space groups and attempt to undermine percolating conspiracy theories by raising doubts about their factual premises, causal logic or implications for political action." "We expect such tactics from undercover cops, or FBI," Estrin writes at the Rag Blog, expressing surprise that "a high-level presidential advisor" would support such a strategy. Estrin notes that Sunstein advocates in his article for the infiltration of "extremist" groups so that it undermines the groups' confidence to the extent that "new recruits will be suspect and participants in the group’s virtual networks will doubt each other’s bona fides." Sunstein has been the target of numerous "conspiracy theories" himself, mostly from the right wing political echo chamber, with conservative talking heads claiming he favors enacting " a second Bill of Rights " that would do away with the Second Amendment. Sunstein's recent book, On Rumors: How Falsehoods Spread, Why We Believe Them, What Can Be Done , was criticized by some on the right as "a blueprint for online censorship." Sunstein "wants to hold blogs and web hosting services accountable for the remarks of commenters on websites while altering libel laws to make it easier to sue for spreading 'rumors,'" wrote Ed Lasky at American Thinker .

AlterNet Example 1: https://www.alternet.org/2017/06/how-media-missed-biggest-political-surprise-year

As they did with the U.S. election and the Brexit vote, the majority of U.S. and British media got Thursday's British general election wrong for months on a massive scale. The conventional wisdom on both sides of the Atlantic was that the Conservative Party was on route to a historic landslide victory over the "far-left," "radical" Labour candidate Jeremy Corbyn—who was, due to said far left-ness, a drag on the party: Isn't It About Time Labour Realised That Things Aren't Going Too Well for Them , The Independent Poll Results: A Tory Landslide Victory Seems Pretty Inevitable Right Now , Business Insider After Hard-Left Turn Under Jeremy Corbyn, Britain's Labour Party on Course for Historic Defeat , Washington Post No More Excuses: Jeremy Corbyn is to Blame for This Meltdown , The Guardian Is Corbyn the Face of an Isolated Labour? U.S. News Except, the opposite happened. Instead of losing the predicted 100-150 seats, Labour actually gained 32 seats, and instead of increasing its majority, the Conservative Party lost 13 seats and its majority in the House of Commons, forcing it into a potential coalition with the far-right Democratic Union Party. Both U.S. and British pundits were equal parts wrong and smug. Media Matters For America's Eric Boehlert tweeted that "Corbyn's been a disaster for Labour." Center-left U.K. gatekeeper New Statesment lamented its "election prediction for Labour is dire." High-profile British pundit Nick Cohen insisted "Corbyn's Labour won't just lose. It'll be slaughtered." America's Zack Beauchamp of Vox held up Corbyn as exhibit A for why "left-wing populism" wasn't up to the task of taking on a resurrgent right-wing popuism. These predictions were vaguely backed up by polls showing a major Labour loss, but here we're stuck in a vicious cycle: sneering pundit leads to bad press leads to low polling which, in turn, leads to even more sneering pundits. A similar feature plagued U.S. progressive candidate Bernie Sanders, who was dismissed by the media as incapable of winning based largely on low poll numbers and bad showing in the betting markets, which themselves were a result of a media that constantly told voters he was incapable of winning. This is seen starkly in how candidates are treated early on in the election process. According to one survey of nightly broadcast network news during the 2015 primary season, Sanders received a total of 20 minutes of coverage, compared to Clinton's 121 and Trump's 327. This, in addition, to Sanders losing what's called the "invisible" primary comprised of major party donors and establishment party leadership. Just the same, two separate studies showed that Corbyn received overwhelmingly negative coverage from across the political press—again, all before a single voter had a say in an actual election. How exactly Corbyn overcame this deficit to shock the political world is for political scientists to sort out. (Vice's Sam Kriss offers up the simple argument that it was, for lack of a better word, "hope.") But one thing is clear: He did so in spite of the media and elite consensus that he was an unelectable "hard leftist" that solidified the second he won the Labour leadership in September 2015. The question facing good-faith editors, writers and producers now is how to break the sneering pundit/bad press/low polling cycle so they can, at the very least, stop being colossally wrong all the time. How to look beyond the groupthink and identify forces that exist outside newsrooms and blue checkmark Twitter. In the past few days, dozens of pundits and politicians who predicted Labour's demise have had to eat crow (and, in once case, literally eat their own book .) I n a moment of self awareness, long-time Corbyn-derider and Zack Beauchamp opined: "If these exits are right, I completely underestimated Corbyn's Labour. I'm going to need to think hard as to why." The reason is that too many pundits view themselves as simply objective observers recounting objective fact. After all, this is Vox

Media and many other pundits' whole pitch: We're post-ideological wonks just calling balls and strikes. "Corbyn is a trainwreck" because polls say he is. Why they say so and will they say so after two months of campaigning is never really discussed much less explored. "Experts" agree. "Most economists" believe. It's just the way it is. Never do they reflect upon their own role in this cycle. When the deck is stacked so heavily in favor of the status quo, when the conventional wisdom of austerity politics and reasonable, sensible plans to raise tuition rates and bomb Syria just...is, remaining "neutral" is to give in to the inertia of lowered expectations. It's to pawn off the descriptive as the normative, the way things are with the way things ought to be. Populating our media with weathervanes who equate envisioning a world beyond the latest YouGov poll with Stalinism has rendered it uniquely inadequate for the times we live in—a fact that grows increasingly obvious with every set of blown predictions.

AlterNet Example 2: https://www.alternet.org/2017/10/4-signs-rapists-are-getting-rights-back

So far, 2017 has been a good year for rapists. There was a time not so long ago when women had no rights or platform to speak up about the sexual violence they experienced. After some slow progress by women's advocates, activists and progressive politicians to publicize and document the alarming frequency of sexual assault cases, dangerous new developments are setting the country back. Brock Turner's case showed us how sympathetic the American public and mainstream media can be toward rapists, and how lightly the justice system punishes white, privileged men for their crimes. Now, prominent members of government like Candice E. Jackson, the Department of Education's top civil rights official, can freely say to the New York Times that "90 percent " of sexual assault accusations are false or exaggerated, with no scientific backing for such claims. All four of these recent shifts don't bode well for women. 1. Rapists in multiple states get to be part of their children's lives. In April of this year, a bill that would have protected rape survivors from sharing custody of children with their rapists failed—for the ninth time—to pass Maryland's legislature. Seven states still have no laws protecting women from this traumatic situation. 2. Bill Cosby still faces no consequences for his crimes and is becoming a poster child for the wrongfully accused. A mistrial saved him from any jail time or other consequences, and now 60-time accused rapist Bill Cosby plans to help " educate" male students on how to avoid rape accusations , because, as his spokesperson said, "they need to know what they're facing when they're hanging out and partying." It's a twisted PR move that will only further discourage sexual assault victims from speaking out. 3. Betsy DeVos successfully campaigned to defend accused rapists on campus. DeVos last month rescinded the Title IX campus sexual assault guidance , authored by the Obama administration, that notified universities of their legal requirement to report sexual assault. An estimated 19% of college-age women have suffered sexual assault or attempts at it, or only 12% of those cases ever get reported. The Trump team's determination to revoke all the good done by Obama's two terms seems to have no end. And on that note: 4. The White House website removed its page on sexual assault. Just as pages on LGBT rights, climate change and animal welfare were taken down after Trump's win, the new administration removed a significant study titled " Rape And Sexual Assault: A Renewed Call To Action " that was published in 2014. As Know Your IX founder and attorney Alexandra Brodsky told the Huffington Post, "This is a summary of really important, and in some cases, government-funded work that was done to understand the causes and effects of sexual and gender violence. What does it mean that the Trump administration doesn't want the public to have that information?" It means that the safety and rights of those who suffer rape and sexual assault don't matter much in the worldview of our president. These are signs of the times. Some can be blamed on Trump's administration and the GOP establishment that's been working to disenfranchise women for years. The moves can also be tracked to the '80s-era resurgence of Christian morality, which clamped down on progress made by the second wave of feminism to revert back to a time when white men had it all, and got to eat their cake, too. Regardless of the cause, the results are scary.

AlterNet Example 3: https://www.alternet.org/2017/07/breitbarts-disinformation-dominated-right-wing-media-2016-creating-dark-paranoid-fact

Right-wing media evolved into a hall of mirrors in 2016, when Breitbart displaced Fox News as the key agenda-setting and attack-leading epicenter of a disinformation-filled, paranoid ecosystem promoting Donald Trump and his pro-white America agenda. Breitbart not only led the right's obsessive, hostile focus on immigrants, it was also the first to attack professional reporting such as the New York Times and Washington Post. Breitbart's disruptive template fueled the political and information universe we now inhabit, where the right dismisses facts and embraces fantasies. There is no corollary dynamic on the left or among pro-Clinton audiences in 2016. The left's news sources, media consumption and patterns of social media-sharing are more open-minded and fact-based and less insular and aggressive. Still, Breitbart's obsessive focus on fabricating and hyping scandals involving Hillary Clinton (and Jeb Bush early in the primary season) pushed mainstream media to disproportionately cover its agenda. These observations are among the takeaways of a major study from Columbia Journalism Review that analyzed 1.25 million stories published online between April 2015 and Election Day 2016. While the study affirmed what many analysts have long perceived—that right-wing media and those who consume it inhabit a paranoid and dark parallel universe—it also documented shifts in the right's media ecosystem; namely, Breitbart supplanting Fox News as the leading purveyor of extreme disinformation. "A right-wing media network anchored around Breitbart [has] developed as a distinct and insulated media system, using social media as a backbone to transmit a hyper-partisan perspective to the world," CJR wrote. "This pro-Trump media sphere appears to have not only successfully set the agenda for the conservative media sphere, but also strongly influenced the broader media agenda, in particular coverage of Hillary Clinton." The CJR report said Americans' media consuming habits are "asymmetric," meaning those on the left—progressives and Democrats—rely on more diverse outlets and content, compared to the right. "Pro-Clinton audiences were highly attentive to traditional media outlets, which continued to be the most prominent outlets across the public sphere, alongside more left-oriented online sites," CJR wrote. "But pro-Trump audiences paid the majority of their attention to polarized outlets that have developed recently, many of them only since the 2008 election season." The pro-Trump media specialized in what CJR called "disinformation," where facts are presented in isolation or stripped of context, and then exaggerated or hyped to produce false sense of alarm or crisis. This is more sophisticated than merely lying, they said. "Rather than 'fake news' in the sense of wholly fabricated falsities, many of the most-shared stories can more accurately be understood as disinformation: the purposeful construction of true or partly true bits of information into a message that is, at its core, misleading," CJR said. "Over the course of the election, this turned the right-wing media system into an internally coherent, relatively insulated knowledge community, reinforcing the shared worldview of readers and shielding them from journalism that challenged it. The prevalence of such material has created an environment in which the President can tell supporters about events in Sweden that never happened, or a presidential advisor can reference a non-existent 'Bowling Green massacre.'" CJR's methodology looked at how the 1.25 million stories were shared or referenced online; e.g., if a person shared a story from Breitbart, what other sites was he likely to share or hyperlink to? CJR used an open source program called Media Cloud, which was developed for studying media at Harvard University and MIT. The most frequently shared sources among Trump supporters, in descending order, were Breitbart, The Hill, Fox News, Gateway Pundit, Politico, Washington Examiner, Daily Caller, CNN,

Washington Post, New York Times, donaldjtrump.com, Conservative Treehouse, InfoWars, Daily Mail, Truthfeed, New York Post, Investors, the Right Scoop, statespoll.com, and Conservative Tribune. The most frequently shared sources among Clinton supporters, in descending order, were Washington Post, Huffington Post, New York Times, The Hill, CNN, Politico, Politicus USA, Daily Kos, Raw Story, hillaryclinton.com, MSNBC, Salon, Think Progress, Daily Newsbin, Mother Jones, Talking Points Memo, Daily Beast, Media Matters, NBC News and Vox. Notably, there was virtually no middle ground. The most centrist news source, as measured by comparable volume of shares by Trump and Clinton supporters was the Wall Street Journal, CJR found. "There are very few center-right sites: sites that draw many Trump followers, but also a substantial number of Clinton followers," they said. "Between the moderately conservative Wall Street Journal, which draws Clinton and Trump supporters in equal shares, and the starkly partisan sites that draw Trump supporters by ratios of 4:1 or more, there are only a handful of sites. Once a threshold of partisan-only attention is reached, the number of sites in the clearly partisan right increases, and indeed exceeds the number of sites in the clearly partisan left." Hyper-Partisan Disinformation The emergence of a self-segregating, far-right media universe is a relatively recent development. This fractured and self-referencing ecosystem barely existed before Barack Obama became president in 2008. As CJR noted, when Ronald Reagan became president in 1980, the only far-right publication was the New York Post. By the time Bill Clinton was elected in 1992, there was "only the Washington Times, Rush Limbaugh, and arguably Sean Hannity." In 1996, Fox News was launched, and Alex Jones of InfoWars went on the radio. Breitbart was not founded until 2007. Breitbart first displaced Fox News in the GOP's crowded primary season early in 2016, CJR reported, when there was a field of 17 candidates and no clear frontrunner. "The pattern of hyper-partisan attack was set during the primary campaign, targeting not only opposing candidates but also media that did not support Trump's candidacy," it said. "The February map [of the most read and shared websites], for example, shows Fox News as a smaller node quite distant from the Breitbart-centered right. It reflects the fact that Fox News received less attention than it did earlier or later in the campaign, and less attention, in particular, from users who also paid attention to the core Breitbart-centered sites and whose attention would have drawn Fox closer to Breitbart." CJR explained that Breitbart started to attack Fox News early in 2016. "The top-20 stories in the right-wing media ecology during January included, for example, 'Trump Campaign Manager Reveals Fox News Debate Chief Has Daughter Working for Rubio.' More generally, the five most widely shared stories in which Breitbart refers to Fox are stories aimed to delegitimize Fox as the central arbiter of conservative news, tying it to immigration, terrorism and Muslims, and corruption." The list is: The Anti-Trump Network: Fox News Money Flows into Open Borders Group NY Times Bombshell Scoop: Fox News Colluded with Rubio to Give Amnesty to Illegal Aliens Google and Fox TV Invite Anti-Trump, Hitler-Citing, Muslim Advocate to Join Next GOP TV-Debate Fox, Google Pick 1994 Illegal Immigrant To Ask Question in Iowa GOP Debate Fox News at Facebook Meeting Is Misdirection: Murdoch and Zuckerberg Are Deeply Connected Over Immigration Those attacks ceased by late spring, when the finalists for the GOP nomination were Trump and Ted Cruz. By then, CJR reported that the most-shared news sources on the right were, in descending order, Breitbart, Fox News, Daily Caller, Gateway Pundit, Washington Examiner, WikiLeaks and InfoWars. On the left, the most shared sources as the primaries ended were: CNN, the New York Times, the Washington Post, Huffington Post, The Hill and Politico. But even as red and blue America turned to differing media, CJR noted that the right's aggressive and hyperbolic political attacks shaped coverage by more mainstream and professionalized outlets. "The right-wing media was also able to bring the focus on immigration, Clinton emails, and scandals more generally to the broader media environment," CJR said. "A sentence-level analysis of stories throughout the media environment suggests that Donald Trump's substantive agenda—heavily focused on immigration and direct attacks on Hillary Clinton—came to dominate public discussions," it continued. "The right-wing media was also able to bring the focus on immigration, Clinton emails, and scandals more generally to the broader media environment… [and these] came to dominate public discussions." Right-wing media wasn't just setting the topical news agenda, it was shaping the angles or slants taken, CJR noted. "While mainstream media coverage was often critical, it nonetheless revolved around the agenda that the right-wing media sphere set: immigration. Right-wing media, in turn, framed immigration in terms of terror, crime, and Islam, as a review of Breitbart and other right-wing media stories about immigration most widely shared on social media exhibits." As the campaign crested, right-wing media was churning out a fount of propaganda, CJR said, saying its disinformation epitomized "the paranoid" in our politics. "What we find in our data is a network of mutually reinforcing hyper-partisan sites that revive what Richard Hofstadter called 'the paranoid style in American politics,' combining decontextualized truths, repeated falsehoods, and leaps of logic to create a fundamentally misleading view of the world," CJR said. "'Fake news,' which implies made of whole cloth by politically disinterested parties out to make a buck of Facebook advertising dollars, rather than propaganda and disinformation, is not an adequate term. By repetition, variation, and circulation through many associated sites, the network of sites make their claims familiar to readers, and this fluency with the core narrative gives credence to the incredible." CJR gave stunning examples. It cited examples by Ending the Fed, which was one of the most frequently shared right-wing sites on Facebook. "While Ending the Fed clearly had great success marketing stories on Facebook, our analysis shows nothing distinctive about the site—it is simply part-and-parcel of the Breitbart-centered sphere," it wrote. "The false claims perpetuated in Ending the Fed's most-shared posts are well established tropes in right wing media: the leaked Podesta emails, alleged Saudi funding of Clinton's campaign, and a lack of credibility in media. The most Facebook-shared story by Ending the Fed in October was 'IT'S OVER: Hillary's ISIS Email Just Leaked & It's Worse Than Anyone Could Have Imagined.' See also, InfoWars' 'Saudi Arabia has funded 20% of Hillary's Presidential Campaign, Saudi Crown Prince Claims,' and Breitbart's 'Clinton Cash: Khizr Khan's Deep Legal, Financial Connections to Saudi Arabia, Hillary's Clinton Foundation Tie Terror, Immigration, Email Scandals Together.' "This mix of claims and facts, linked through paranoid logic characterizes much of the most shared content linked to Breitbart," CJR continued. "It is a mistake to dismiss these stories as 'fake news;' their power stems from a potent mix of verifiable facts (the leaked Podesta emails), familiar repeated falsehoods, paranoid logic, and consistent political orientation within a mutually reinforcing network of like-minded sites." Needless to say, CJR believes the right's fact-averse, hyper-partisan hate-mongering is extremely dangerous for American culture and politics. That's because wide disinformation erodes the prospect of governing based on compromises. If there's any silver lining to CJR's analysis, it is that red and blue America still "pay attention to traditional media, following professional journalistic practices, and cross-reference what they read on partisan sites." But there is no going back to a simpler, pre-internet past. Today's press must recognize "it is operating in a propaganda and disinformation rich environment," CJR said. "Rising to that challenge could usher in a new golden age for the Fourth Estate." CJR ended its report on that upbeat note. For the rest of us, its research and reporting tell us it is no accident that Breitbart's Steve Bannon is in the White House as Trump's senior strategist. He helped put Trump there by fanning an unheralded wave of dark propaganda and opening a Pandora's Box that is not about to be closed.

Exhibit 6

This exhibit reports the result of the application of the Newspaper text extraction method to three URLs from rawstory.com and three URLs from Alternet.org that are listed in the OpenWebText training set described in Plaintiffs' First Amended Complaint. A data scientist employed by Plaintiffs' counsel followed the text extraction steps described by OpenAI in the paper Alec Radford et al., Language Models are Unsupervised Multitask Learners, 3 https://cdn.openai.com/better-language-models/language_models_are_unsupervised_multitask_learners.pdf. First, the data scientist downloaded the content of the URLs in ."html" form. (Plaintiffs' counsel later confirmed that each article, as downloaded, contained author, title, and copyright notice information.) Second, he applied the Newspaper code to the downloaded article. Based on the assumption that OpenAI desired the Newspaper extraction method to be consistent with the Dragnet extraction method, and the fact that the Dragnet extraction method does not extract author and title information, he used a version of the Newspaper code designed not to extract author and title information. The results are reproduced below. Each sample begins with the URL of the webpage followed by the entire content of the copy after the application of the Newspaper code.

Raw Story Example 1: https://www.rawstory.com/2014/08/robbery-suspect-killed-cops-crew-member-badly-injured-in-omaha-police-shootout/

A suspect is dead and a crew member from the reality TV show "Cops" has died after police in Omaha, Nebraska, responded to a robbery in progress at a Wendy's restaurant.
According to Omaha.com, a lone police officer radioed from the Wendy's around 9:20 p.m. to call for backup. A robbery was in progress involving a man wearing a dark colored hooded sweatshirt and a white bandanna.
Deputy Police Chief Dave Baker told Omaha.com that the suspect opened fire, spraying bullets into the restaurant's dining room and shattering its east-facing windows. The officer on the scene reportedly returned fire, killing the suspect.
Omaha.com later reported that the suspect was carrying an air gun that looked like an actual gun. The only real shots fired came from police.
Multiple people were injured, but the suspect was the only fatality, said Baker. The injured were taken to local hospitals and treated. A crew member from "Cops," 38-year-old Bryce Dion, died from his injuries.
"We are deeply saddened and shocked by this tragedy and our main concern is helping his family in any way we can. Bryce Dion was a long term member of the Cops team and a very talented and dedicated person. We mourn his passing. An investigation is ongoing and we are cooperating with local authorities," Langley Productions, the producer of "Cops," said in a statement.
"Cops" has been filming in Omaha for much of the summer. The show's producers and local police had hoped that filming police actions for television would improve relations between the police force and the community.
In June, Police Chief Todd Schmaderer said, "(I) want the professionalism of our officers on display for the city and world to see."

Raw Story Example 2: https://www.rawstory.com/2012/08/three-planes-nearly-collide-at-d-c-area-airport/

Three commercial airplanes owned by US Airways nearly collided on Wednesday afternoon during inclement weather at the Ronald Reagan National Airport in Arlington, Virginia.
Authorities attribute the near-crash to a "miscommunication between the Tracon and the DCA tower led to a loss of the required separation between two regional jets departing from Runway 1 and a regional jet inbound for Runway 19," the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) told CNN.
The audio obtained from the air traffic control tower indicates confusion. A pilot who was approaching the airport asked the tower, "We were cleared [for landing] at the river there. What happened?"
The controller paused and responded, "Stand by, we're trying to figure this out."
The pilot objected to calls to take a second loop as two more planes were attempting to take off. "We really don't have enough fuel here for this. We have to get on the ground pretty quick."
US Airways issued a statement to CNN, saying, "We are currently investigating and working with the FAA to determine what occurred. The safety of our customers and employees is always our top priority."
National Airport has been the subject of several safety incidents in recent years. According to the Washington Post, a control tower supervisor was suspended in March when he, as the only controller on duty during the midnight-to-6 a.m. shift, failed to respond to two planes attempting to land. Some suspected he may have fallen asleep.
The FAA recorded 1,887 errors in 2010, an increase over the 1,234 recorded in 2009, even though there were fewer flights in 2010, the Post reported.

Raw Story Example 3: https://www.rawstory.com/2013/03/smart-bra-detects-breast-cancer-years-earlier-than-mammograms/

A new "smart bra" currently undergoing clinical trials can detect cell mutations in the breasts up to six years earlier than traditional mammograms, according to the company that made the device.

The so-called "First Warning System" likely saved the life of Nedra Lindsay, a nurse who discovered she had breast cancer nearly 20 years ago, at the age of 24, after she tried out an early prototype of the device before it was in bra-form. Lindsay was featured Monday in a report by CBS Boston, saying the sensors that are now in the bra showed "proof positive that I had cancer."

It works by repeatedly measuring heat patterns and the shape of a breast over the course of a day, using detailed readings to track tiny changes in temperature caused by the growth of blood vessels. The computer in the bra can then compare thousands of data points picked up with its sensors to bioinformatic profiles of cancerous tissues, which the company says enables them to deliver a detection alert with up to 90 percent accuracy.

Because it is so sensitive, the bra can actually detect a breast tumor after it has spent just a few years developing. That's compared to mammography, usually recommended for women over 40, which usually does not detect such young tumors, leaving doctors to stare at an image of a white mass in search of white spots that could represent dense tissue.

While the company has not yet released its clinical trial data, First Warning Systems hopes to have its bra approved by the Food & Drug Administration and on the market within a year. It will likely require a doctor's prescription.

AlterNet Example 3: https://www.alternet.org/2016/05/exposing-trumps-decades-deep-ties-organized-crime

The first decades of Donald Trump's career as a New York City builder and Atlantic City casino magnate are filled with lasting and documented ties to organized crime—including mobsters who went to federal prison, according to a recent series of detailed investigative reports.

"No other candidate for the White House this year has anything close to Trump's record of repeated social and business dealings with mobsters, swindlers, and other crooks," wrote David Cay Johnston for Politico.com. "In all, I've covered Donald Trump off and on for 27 years, and in that time I've encountered multiple threads linking Trump to organized crime."

"Well, to be a developer in New York City, to be fair, you had to, in those days—this is talking about the late '70s and 1980s, early '90s—you had to brush up against the mob," Tom Robbins, who covered organized crime, labor and politics for decades for The New York Daily News and Village Voice, told Democracy Now, when talking about his report for TheMarshallProject.org. "They were a force both on the employer side and particularly on the union side. But despite that problem, Don Trump seemed to keep running into them over and over again. They bought apartments in his Trump Tower, in Trump Plaza. You know, they kept showing up as people that he was carousing with."

Robbins, who called Trump, "the slickest con-man out of New York City," said the Republicans had no idea who their presidential nominee was. But as he reported for the Marshall Project, which covers criminal justice issues, and Johnston, a Pulitzer Prize winning business reporter wrote for politico.com, Trump knew he wanted to make a fortune soon after graduating from the University of Pennsylvania in 1968 and found a role model in one of the sleaziest lawyers in America—Roy Cohn. In the 1950s, Cohn helped Wisconsin Republican Sen. Joseph McCarthy persecute Hollywood figures for allegedly supporting Communism. Years later when Trump met Cohn, he had moved to New York City and was advising the city's leading organized crime figures.

"Trump's mentor on issues of politics and business was Roy Cohn, a lawyer whose other clients included a passel of mobsters, among them the bosses of the Genovese and Gambino crime families," wrote Robbins. "Cohn… operated out of a townhouse on East 68th Street where clients Anthony 'Fat Tony' Salerno and Paul 'Big Paul' Castellano were regular visitors. Besides getting advice on their legal problems, as a former secretary later recalled to [Village Voice reporter] Wayne Barrett in his 1992 book, "Trump: The Deals and the Downfall," the visits by the mob titans to their lawyer's office allowed them to talk shop without having to worry about FBI bugs. Cohn told a reporter that Trump called him 'fifteen to twenty times a day, asking what's the status of this, what's the status of that,' according to Barrett's book."

What brought Trump and a coterie of mobsters together—whether acquiring real estate, doing the heavy labor tasks involved in building high-rises, or pampering the high rollers frequenting his his properties—was Trump would do whatever was needed to create the businesses that made him a billionaire today, these investigative journalists reported.

As the Robbins wrote, "To help build his first big Manhattan project, the Grand Hyatt New York on East 42nd Street, Trump had chosen a notorious demolition company secretly owned in part, according to the FBI, by a top Philadelphia mobster who doubled as crime lord of Atlantic City. To pour concrete for the new hotel, Trump picked a firm run by a man named Biff Halloran who was convicted a few years later for his role in what prosecutors dubbed a mob-run cartel that jacked up construction prices throughout the city. For the carpentry contract, Trump settled on a Genovese family-controlled enterprise that was central to another mob price-fixing racket, as found by a subsequent federal probe."

Johnston, who won a Pulitzer for covering tax issues at The New York Times, said he asked Barnett—who reported for and edited The Village Voice—why did Trump work with mob figures: "'Why'd Donald do it?' Barrett said when I put the question to him. 'Because he saw these mob guys as pathways to money, and Donald is all about money.'"

Robbins' and Johnston's investigative reports read like tabloid movies set in the sleazy 1970s and 1980s. Trump hastily demolished the Bonwit Teller department store on Fifth Avenue in midtown Manhanttan to build the Trump Tower, where he lives and his campaign offices are based. As Robbins reported, "On paper, the demolition contractor was a union company, as were all of Trump's vendors at the time. But Local 95 of the demolition workers was essentially a subsidiary of the Genovese crime family, and few union rules were enforced. Most of the workers were undocumented immigrants from Poland and they were paid so little and so sporadically that many were forced sleep on the job site. A rank and file union dissident later sued Trump for failing to pay pension and medical benefits required under the union contract. Trump denied knowing about conditions at the work site… Despite Trump's insistence that he never settles lawsuits, he wound up settling that one for an undisclosed sum."

Johnston's reporting goes even deeper, questioning why Trump Tower and other projects are not using steel girder construction or precast concrete but ready-mix concrete—which can speed up construction, does not require expensive fireproofing, but must be poured very quickly or it will harden inside cement trucks.

"That leaves developers vulnerable to the unions: the worksite gate is union controlled, so even a brief labor slowdown can turn into an expensive disaster," he wrote. "Salerno, Castellano and other organized crime figures controlled the ready-mix business in New York, and everyone in construction at the time knew it. So did government investigators trying to break up the mob, urged on by major developers such as the LeFrak and Resnick families. Trump ended up not only using ready-mix concrete, but also paying what a federal indictment of Salerno later concluded were inflated prices for it – repeatedly – to S & A Concrete, a firm Salerno and Castellano owned through fronts, and possibly to other mob-controlled firms. As Barrett noted, by choosing to build with ready-mix concrete rather than other materials, Trump put himself 'at the mercy of a legion of concrete racketeers.'"

Apparently, this was the cost of doing business for Trump, including, as Johnston notes, paying for no-show union jobs. "Irving Fischer, the general contractor who built Trump Tower… said concrete union 'goons' once stormed his offices, holding a knife to throat of his switchboard operator to drive home the seriousness of their demands, which included no-show jobs during construction of Trump Tower."

Trump's connection to mob figures has an evidence trail that runs through federal prosecutor offices and into federal courtrooms, where his associations are part of the legal record. "The indictment on which Salerno was convicted in 1988 and sent to prison, where he died, listed the nearly $8 million contract for concrete at Trump Plaza, an East Side high-rise apartment building, as one of the acts establishing that S &A was part of a racketeering enterprise," wrote Johnston. "While the concrete business was central to the case, the trial also proved extortion, narcotics, rigged union elections and murders by the Genovese and Gambino crime families in what Michael Chertoff, the chief prosecutor, called 'the largest and most vicious criminal business in the history of the United States.'"

That was not the only example. As Johnston noted, referring to the hiring of Polish workers who were paid sub-union wages when clearing the Trump Tower site, "In 1991, a federal judge, Charles E. Stewart Jr., ruled that Trump had engaged in a conspiracy to violate a fiduciary duty, or duty of loyalty, to the workers and their union and that the 'breach involved fraud and the Trump defendants knowingly participated in his breach.' The judge did not find Trump's testimony to be sufficiently credible and set damages at $325,000. The case was later settled by negotiation, and the agreement was sealed."

On To New Jersey

Trump, apparently, has always said whatever is necessary to get his way—even if it is directly contradicted by his past behavior. That was the case when he expanded into New Jersey and told the state attorney general, and later its casino regulators, that he never had anything to do with mob figures in New York or in developing his Atlantic City casino, the reporters said.

Trump himself bragged in his book, The Art of The Deal, that in 1981 he threatened New Jersey's Attorney General, John Degnan, with canceling the project unless the state limited its background investigation of him to six months—not the usual year or more. Part of Trump's push apparently was a promise that he would oppose any effort to expand gambling to New York City. As Johnston noted, "Trump was required to disclose any investigations in which he might have been involved in the past, even if they never resulted in charges. Trump didn't disclose a federal grand jury inquiry into how he obtained an option to buy the Penn Central railroad yards on the West Side of Manhattan. The failure to disclose either that inquiry or the Cody inquiry probably should have disqualified Trump from receiving a license under the standards set by the gaming authorities."

But, as Johnston and the other reporters observed, New Jersey's gaming regulators didn't want to admit they made a mistake when licensing a casino operator, so Trump got away with that omission. Johnston then described how Trump had to deal with mobsters to buy the land for a parking lot next to his Atlantic City casino, which the state eventually pushed back on.

"Trump built on property where mobsters controlled parts of the adjoining land needed for parking," he wrote. "He paid $1.1 million for about a 5,000-square-foot lot that had been bought five years earlier for just $195,000. The sellers were Salvy Testa and Frank Narducci Jr., a pair of hitmen for Atlantic City mob boss Nicky Scarfo who were known as the Young Executioners.

For several adjoining acres, Trump ignored the principal owner of record and instead negotiated directly in a deal that also likely ended up benefiting the Scarfo mob. Trump arranged a 98-year lease deal with [Daniel] Sullivan, the FBI informant and labor fixer, and Ken Shapiro, described in government reports as Scarfo's 'investment banker.' Eventually the lease was converted into a sale after the Division of Gaming Enforcement objected to Sullivan and Shapiro being Trump's landlords."

High-Flying Drug Dealers

Robbins reported another of Trump's colleagues was Joseph Weichselbaum, who ran a helicopter service that ferried gamblers and others between his properties, lived in Trump Plaza, and "pleaded guilty to federal charges of cocaine smuggling in 1986. The men were close enough that Trump agreed to accept part of the rent as helicopter service in barter. Weichselbaum also maintained Trump's own private helicopter. And when Weichselbaum faced sentencing, Trump provided a letter to the court endorsing his friend as 'conscientious, forthright and diligent.' Weichselbaum received a three-year sentence and came home to reside in an even posher pad at Trump Tower, where his girlfriend had managed to buy two combined apartments. When Trump was asked in 1990 by casino officials about his letter to the judge on Weichselbaum's behalf, the casino mogul could not recall having written it."

Johnston's report added, "Trump and Weichselbaum were so close, Barrett reported in his book, that Weichselbaum told his parole officer about how he knew Trump was hiding his mistress, Marla Maples, from his first wife, Ivana, and tried to persuade Trump to end their years-long affair." Trump continued to use Weichselbaum's firm after he was indicted in Ohio on charges of trafficking in marijuana and cocaine, "conduct that again could have cost Trump his casino license had state regulators pressed the matter, because casino owners were required to distance themselves from any hint of crime."

Fast forward to 2016, Johnston recounts his most recent conversation with Trump, late last month, where the presidential candidate downplayed these associations, saying they were long ago—and he could not remember the details, and then threatened him.

"Some of Trump's unsavory connections have been followed by investigators and substantiated in court; some haven't. And some of those links have continued until recent years, though when confronted with evidence of such associations, Trump has often claimed a faulty memory," he wrote. "In an April 27 phone call to respond to my questions for this story, Trump told me he did not recall many of the events recounted in this article and they 'were a long time ago.' He also said that I had 'sometimes been fair, sometimes not' in writing about him, adding 'if I don't like what you write, I'll sue you.'"

As these New York-based investigative reporters have written in covering Trump for decades, his life has been about the next big score, whether it was getting a $400 million tax break on his first big project, building signature properties, obtaining casino licenses, getting fees for placing his names on products, and more.

"Through Cohn, Trump made choices that—gratuitously, it appears—resulted in his first known business dealings with mob-controlled companies and unions, a pattern that continued long after Cohn died," Johnston wrote. "What Trump has to say about the reasons for his long, close and wide-ranging dealings with organized crime figures, with the role of mobsters in cheating Trump Tower workers… and Trump's seeming leniency for Weichselbaum are questions that voters deserve full answers about before casting their ballots."

Whether Trump will get away with deflecting scrutiny of his past as the 2016 Republican presidential candidate is an open question. As we have seen thus far, he has successfully refused to release his income tax returns, which would reveal if he pays any taxes.

"We're just scratching the surface here," Robbins told Democracy Now, "There's a lot more. This has been a deal maker in New York and across the world for 40 years. He's come up against some incredibly shady characters. So now the question is: Will people get him to actually answer questions and try to get down below the level? So far, none of these [campaign] stories, I think, have scratched the surface."

AlterNet Example 4: https://www.alternet.org/2016/12/young-sanders-campaign-aides-plan-anti-trump-permanent-protest-base-washington

The organizers behind Millennials for Bernie are raising money to create an anti-Trump movement headquarters in Washington DC that will be a base for sustained resistance against the next president and his administration.

“This house is supposed to be a place for everybody, regardless of what happened in the general election, to come together and fight,” said Moumita Ahmed, whose organizing helped millennials become involved in Sanders’ campaign and is setting up the house. “We are going to be there to hold him accountable and delegitimize literally everything that he is doing and not let him succeed.”

“Some of the things that are going to happen in this house are workshops, people coming in and talking about big organizing,” she continued. “We’re going to have parties. We’re going to have rallies that are going to be organized there. These are just basic ideas, but we know that once this house is available that people will come in and want to do more creative forms of resistance.”

Like Sanders’ campaign, the project is seeking $27 donations and is about halfway to its initial $30,000 goal, to set up the house before Trump's January 20 inauguration. They are calling it the District 13 House, named after the rebellious province in The Hunger Games, the dystopian book and movie series featuring a world run by oligarchs.

“We’re going to be there to sustain resistance against this administration,” Ahmed said. “We feel that the Trump administration is totally illegitimate, because of the way that he ran his campaign, and how he won, and even though mainstream media will say things like, ‘Oh, he just said those things, but obviously now that he is in office we think that some of the things he said aren’t going to fly.’ While that might be true or might not be true, we don’t know yet—that does not matter. You do not run that kind of campaign, especially for some of us, who were on a campaign where Bernie specifically said, ‘Do not attack the other person.’ [Trump's] entire campaign wasn’t just attacking Hillary, but literally every single ethnic group out there.”

“We have a long tradition of people involved in resistance movements, and setting up intentional spaces to work out of. It’s incredibly helpful and supportive on a number of levels,” said Nadine Bloch, a longtime Washington-based activist and training director for BeautifulTrouble.org. “I see my role as supporting the folks who will live there and will take on the daily actioneering, if you will. I am really excited to be in that role and be with the young folks who will be living in the house.”

New Challenges, New Progressive Movement

Organizers like Ahmed—talented young women of color—were among the unsung grassroots heroes of the Sanders campaign, say Becky Bond and Zack Exley, who headed the campaign’s digital outreach efforts and have detailed the experience in a new book, Rules for Revolutionaries. Months before Sanders launched his campaign, Ahmed quit her day job to help establish a technology-driven team that eventually empowered volunteers to build and manage an infrastructure that made 75 million phone calls, sent 8 million text messages and held more than 100,000 public meetings, all described in the book.

"Moumita and other volunteers are demonstrating the power of big organizing," Bond said. "When the Bernie campaign shut down, that didn't mean their organizing would be shut down, too. These volunteers were connected to each other via Facebook, Twitter, and other platforms that allowed them not just to communicate but organize and raise money both in social media but also in person in real life—and soon in an actual row house on Capitol Hill."

Ahmed, 26, grew up in New York and said she's always been politically attuned. She first got involved in campaigns when Barack Obama ran for president in 2008, but learned how to be an organizer with Zephyr Teachout's 2014 campaign for governor in New York state, where she was deputy field director.

"When you're an activist, you understand what's happening. You have a lot to say about it. You'll go to events and you'll advocate for change," Ahmed said. "But organizers are people who have this larger goal, even sometimes a smaller goal. They are the ones that are most of the times behind the scenes, and most of the time organizing protests or a campaign, building networks, and just holding the space or activists together. Organizers are like chess players."

Months before Sanders formally announced his bid for president, Ahmed started organizing social media presence and meet-ups for Sanders around the country. When the campaign launched, those volunteers and organizers became its state-by-state staff. Perhaps her biggest contribution, however, was creating Millennials for Bernie, because she said no other candidate was speaking in a way that reached people age 30.

"He understood that we were living in times like the '60s when people were rising up and talking about racial justice issues, and taking to the streets, and going on Twitter and getting their vote heard collectively. And you had two candidates, multiple candidates totally ignoring that reality, versus Bernie who understood," Ahmed said. "I felt that if I were to start a millennial contingent that it would work. A lot of people would be on board. And it was true. Most of Bernie's staffers were millennials. Most of his grassroots were led by millennials. I just wanted to create something so that people know millennials are active, that we're pursuing stuff."

Ahmed spent a year organizing for the campaign, which culminated in being a delegate at the Democratic National Convention. After Clinton emerged with the nomination, the group Ahmed created decided not to endorse anyone, but just work in individual ways for the rest of the campaign. She said millennials are "very pragmatic" and have "very progressive values," and the protest house she is creating in Washington will be a reflection of that ethic as it pushes back against Trump's agenda and policies. "We are going to be like the people's White House," she said. "And we are going to be right there in front of him so we stick out like a sore thumb."

The group doesn't yet have a Capitol Hill residence, but they are fundraising and looking at several locations. Meanwhile, older progressive organizers in Washington are hoping that people around the U.S. will support the District 13 House, and more importantly, see that white middle-class America now finds itself in the same vulnerable boat communities of color have been in for years.

"I actually see something interesting because I have been involved for a long time," Nadine Bloch said. "When people might say to us, particularly let's say white middle-class folks, might say, Oh my god, this is the worst thing ever. You or I have to respond, Well, if you're a black person, if you're a trans person, if you're a black and trans person, you have been been living with the worst thing forever. It has been this bad and it will continue to be this bad unless the people who are now awake, mostly middle-class white folks who have now awakened to how bad it is or might become, actively join the struggle to overcome these problems and to change it."

"Projects like this, where you have dedicated activists 24-7, providing leadership in what can actually make a difference in stopping the aggressive degrading of the rights and the privileges and the health and the safety that we hold dear…that is hopeful," Bloch said. "We have to be willing to do the work and dig in."

AlterNet Example 5: https://www.alternet.org/2017/08/billionaire-backer-peter-thiel-admits-private-trump-administration-incompetent

BuzzFeed describes associates of billionare Peter Thiel as "surprised" to find out the vocal Trump supporter is not even convinced Trump can successfully finish a single term. The hedge fund manager and venture capitalist is best known as the co-creater of PayPal. He currently sits on the board of Facebook.

Thiel donated $1.25 million to Trump's campaign, which BuzzFeed estimates is less than .05% of his net worth. He also spoke at the Republican National Convention in 2016. Thiel was the only openly gay speaker and received an enthusiastic response from the crowd.

Somewhere along the way, Thiel appears to have discovered that Trump may have been a bad bet. Thiel is reportedly calling the Trump administration "incompetent" in front of other people and suggesting to friends that "there is a 50 percent chance this whole thing ends in disaster." He allegedly told associates he didn't have faith in the president's ability to be reelected.

Thiel is trying to quash the story, saying in a statement through a spokesperson: "We still need change. I support President Trump in his ongoing fight to achieve it."

BuzzFeed points out that Thiel isn't actually denying any of the quotes in the story, which includes numerous anonymous sources.

Trump hasn't had a Twitter meltdown yet over his billionaire buddy's private disloyalty. But he probably won't be granting Thiel any more of his signature handshakes in the near future.

This exhibit contains three examples of that content, which is entirely text. Each sample begins with the URL of the webpage followed by the webpage's entire content as it appears in C4:

Example 1: https://www.rawstory.com/2018/11/new-indictments-coming-soon-today-mueller-probe-cbs-news/

Special counsel Robert Mueller could issue new indictments as soon as Tuesday in the ongoing probe of the Trump campaign's ties to Russia.

CBS News reports that indictments could be handed up in the sprawling case, which has already resulted in guilty pleas by top officials who worked to elect President Donald Trump.

Sources with knowledge of the investigation told the network's Paul Reid that they expect the indictments this week, possibly right away.

"I've spoken with many sources with knowledge of the Special Counsel investigation, and we do expect new indictments to be coming as soon as today," Reid said.

The president's former personal attorney, Michael Cohen, was in Washington, D.C., on Monday to meet with Mueller's investigators.

Donald Trump Jr.'s friends have said they believe the president's son will be indicted in the case, and prominent "birther" Jerome Corsi and longtime Republican "dirty trickster" Roger Stone have each said they expected to be indicted.

Example 2: https://www.rawstory.com/2019/03/rich-georgetown-student-bragged-sat-cheating-now-degree-might-jeopardy-report/

Isabelle Henriquez loves finding "all possible solutions" to solving problems, according to her LinkedIn page. It will be helpful now that the FBI is looking into whether she knowingly cheated on her SATs to get into Georgetown University.

She is one of many students who've been named in the Department of Justice's latest investigation about wealthy families forking over massive sums to get their children into top schools. The $25 million scheme now might send Henriquez's parents to jail.

Some students weren't aware of the lengths that their parents were going to score them a leg-up in their future, but Henriquez did. According to the Daily Beast, she is accused of willingly participating, and her degree might be in jeopardy.

"She's the daughter of Manuel and Elizabeth Henriquez, two of the 50 people charged in a $25 million cash-for-college scheme wherein wealthy parents allegedly plotted with an unscrupulous college preparatory business to buy spots at top-flight universities," the site reported Tuesday.

The 204-page court filings say that the Henriquez family paid at least $425,000 to the Edge College & Career Network, also known as "The Key." Founder William Singer, who's agreed to cooperate with investigators, confessed to helping cheat tests, bribe coaches and lie on admission applications to several top schools.

Her parents join at least 50 other families in the indictment. Meanwhile, she says on her LinkedIn page that she's the Incoming summer wealth management analyst in New York, while also being an Investment Banking Intern in Washington, D.C.

Example 3: https://www.rawstory.com/2017/06/heres-why-100-percent-means-nothing-trump-told-30-lies-in-2-days-under-oath-in-2007-testimony/

On Friday, President Donald Trump said that he is "100 percent" willing to testify under oath about his private conversations with fired FBI Director James Comey.

However, according to multiple sources who have been involved with litigation with Trump, the president has a history of lying under oath, so much so that his own bankruptcy lawyers would only meet with him in pairs in order to have a witness to every word that came out of his mouth.

In one sworn deposition from 2007, according to the Washington Post, Trump told 30 lies in two days.

During a lawsuit against author Tim O'Brien — who publicly questioned Trump's "billionaire" status — Trump "misstated sales at his condo buildings. Inflated the price of membership at one of his golf clubs. Overstated the depth of his past debts and the number of his employees," the Post's David Fahrenthold.

"Trump's falsehoods were unstrategic — needless, highly specific, easy to disprove. When caught, Trump sometimes blamed others for the error or explained that the untrue thing really was true, in his mind, because he saw the situation more positively than others did," the Post said.

The experience, O'Brien said, taught him that Trump is "a routine and habitual fabulist," whether he's under oath or not.
